

An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure...

Security cameras are wonderful, but if they are not manned, the best they can do is record. If they are not manned or recording, they may as well not even be there.

When crime occurs, action to stop it must take place within minutes, sometimes even seconds... to be effective.

What if there were cameras on every telephone pole, and registered citizens could access any such public camera?

What if a computer program was installed and set to watch for certain motion signatures and alert the nearest neighbors at signs of suspicion?

How many crimes could be prevented instead of prosecuted after

People disappear every day

After the unthinkable has happened it is already too late, more often than not, to do more than sit and wait... or worse, mourn your loss.

What if the behavior involved in an abduction, grabbing someone and forcefully taking them somewhere, would set off a chain reaction that brought the nearest neighbors out into the street?

If it turned out to be someone horsing around, everything would just go back to normal and no harm would be done. But if it was a malicious act, how many of the above-mentioned scenarios would save a life — or prevent the molestation/robbery of someone?

Take charge of your own life or someone else will take charge of it for you... by default, if not by

21st Century solutions to age-old problems can shackle or free us, depending upon who is in charge. If We the People take responsibility for our own lives and the safety and health of our own homes and neighborhoods; when crime becomes too difficult to commit... the criminals will go somewhere else where it's not so hard to get away with.

Who's watching?

We already have cameras in various places, and you never know who's watching you through them. Wouldn't you feel better if you knew you could log into a secure website and check the view through the cameras near your home at any given time? How much better would you feel if you could view what happened an hour ago? Five minutes ago?

It's really not that hard to accomplish.

What about privacy?

Privacy is an illusion, and more often than not secrecy leads to trouble. Full transparency is admirable, but certainly we don't advocate public cameras in your living room or bedroom. (Unless you're on Reality TV)

The more cameras there are in public places and the more citizens who choose to watch what's going on in their neighborhood, the lower the crime rate will be. There is no doubt about it.

What have you got to hide? If you're walking down the street, minding your own business, nobody's going to give you a second glance. And any computer program set to alert neighbors will not do so when normal activity is apparent. The computer will only be "watching" for aberrant/violent behavior — and the first alert will go to citizens known to have weapons (and restraint yet confidence in using them). The next alert will go to those who might be endangered by the situation, warning them to stay inside until the "all clear" is given, signifying there is no danger or that the incident has been resolved.

Once again: would you rather be alerted after a crime has already been committed, or while one is potentially in progress and still stoppable?
